

Keep your business safer and functioning properly for you and your customers.

Two-thirds of consumers say that personal protective equipment, cleaning procedures and physical distancing requirements help determine where they shop.¹

Communities throughout the United States continue to manage everyday life in light of the global pandemic — and will need to do so for some time, it seems. As a result, businesses must balance the need to reopen for their economic security and to provide goods and services, with the need to follow recommended public health practices and reassure concerned consumers that they take customer and employee safety seriously.

Personal protection equipment (PPE) is likely to be used broadly for the foreseeable future. Safety measures like these are important factors as consumers decide where to take their business — which means the face masks employees wear could affect how consumers view your brand.

Our comprehensive selection of products

Numerous scientific studies conclude that the use of face masks by employees and shoppers can help lower the risk of coronavirus transmission significantly. In addition, hand sanitizer and disposable thermometers contribute to customer and employee wellbeing.
